On 4 February 1999, four white NYPD officers, McMellon, Carroll, Boss, and Murphy, fired 41 shots at suspected African immigrant criminal Amadou Diallo.
Charged with second degree murder and reckless endangerment, officers pled not guilty but risked 25 years to life.
Judge Collins set bail at $100,000 for each officer.
Federal entities, the FBI and Justice Department participated in the investigation.
Both Jesse Jackson and Al Sharpton interjected themselves into the trial and 1203 protesters were arrested.
A principal result of the policemen's case was an examination of police attitudes and tactics across the nation.

Amadou Diallo was an unarmed immigrant from Guinea killed by 4 white police officers in New York City on February 4, 1999.
A grand jury indicted the officers who were arraigned on criminal charges of second degree murder.
The officers pled not guilty.
The trial date is January 3, 2000.
Each officer has separate legal counsel, but there is dissension among their attorneys.
The prosecutor is Robert Johnson, Bronx District Attorney.
Diallo's parents are represented by Johnnie Cochran who states they will file a civil suit as well.
The case has received extensive public and political attention.
